(Shorten instructions a bit)

- a) We chose Henry's as the best instructions because he specified exactly how much you need to turn and every single one of his instructions were clear and broken down into individual steps, used building names, and used road names.
- b) There are many differences to denote throughout all the sets of sequences, including the use of direction(whether angles or left & right), there were differences in the usage of street names and buildings along the way as well.
- c) Some similarities amongst the instructions include using named buildings as stopping points as well as less specific structures such as corners and sidewalks.
- d) i) The instruction use specific road names along with clear steps on when to turn and when to move forward, so whether the person following them new the campus or not should not matter as long as they can look at road signs and signs in front of buildings.

ii)It would change if there was someone using a wheelchair because some activities involved in the plan would be best suitable for those who are mobile without support & interest would not affect the plan as much because that is just a preference or opinion.

iii) The instructions only provide a path through the sidewalks and streets, so if it was raining, it would be hard to follow while taking cover. Additionally, many of the instructions are based around road signs or building names, so if it was hard to see, it would again be difficult to follow as you wouldn't know where to turn or stop.
- e) Some questions that we might have asked in the beginning of the process that would have helped us better the way we wrote our steps would be asking how detailed the steps should be, how good the person following the instructions is at interpreting the steps, and how well they knew the campus
